Application Deadline: October 15, 2018

Description of Experience and Research:

Cultural Airwaves: Teaching Rural Communities in Colombia How to Read and Write.

Between 1947 and 1994 in the countryside outside of Bogotá, Colombia, a radio-based school system was established for the rural communities. Acción Cultural Popular (ACPO) as this project was named, had the purpose of integrating rural communities with the national discourse, improving their economical and spiritual lives while teaching basic reading and writing. To carry out this project, they produced newspapers, workbooks, and audio programs. Letters from the farming communities to the radio instructors also are found in the archives of Acción Cultural Popular.

The main purpose of this collaborative research is for the students to study the archives of Acción Cultural Popular that are located in the Luis Angel Arango Library, in Bogotá. Each student will be in charge of reading through and analyzing one particular topic related to the radio program such as listeners' letters, newspapers edited by the project, audio programs and the reading and writing booklets distributed directly to the farmers. The faculty member and students will then visit the town of Sutatenza (3 hours outside of Bogotá) where the radio station was based as well as some of the communities where this program was implemented to interview people who were involved with the radio station and people who participated in this program. During this month-long collaborative research program we expect to determine the ideological philosophy of this educational program and the type of the "ideal" rural community that this program sought to achieve.

Location:

The program will be based in Bogotá, the capital and largest city in Colombia. It is the political, economic, administrative, industrial, artistic, cultural, and sports center of the country. The city is located in the center of Colombia, on a high plateau known located in the Eastern Cordillera of the Andes Mountains. It is 8,660 feet above sea level and the city is subdivided into 20 localities.

Faculty:

Rodolfo Guzmán is Professor of Spanish and Hispanic Studies at Earlham College. Rodolfo's research interests include the cultural and political productions of the Criollos (a socio-racial stratum that originated during colonial times in the Americas), the Afro-Hispanic experience, the Indigenous narratives of the Andean region, and the deconstruction of the historical discourse through new historical novels and popular performances. Rodolfo has lead cultural immersion programs in Mexico, Costa Rica and established the current Earlham abroad off-campus in Ecuador, and this will be his second year with this research program in Colombia.

Expectations for Students:

In this four-week-long experience, students not only will be immersed in a linguistic and cultural environment where they will improve their conversation, reading and writing skills in Spanish, but more importantly will learn how to work with primary sources for scholarly endeavors. Students will learn how to assess and evaluate documents relating to research in the field of humanities. Students will learn how one particular social-cultural manifestation (a curricular and pedagogical project) can contain information related to the larger social-political landscape. Field trips will illustrate the Latin American differences between urban and rural settings in terms of political participation, quality of life, and access to basic resources (educational, medical, etc.). At the end of the program each student should be able to produce a paper and a 20-minute presentation about their own topic and the research experience itself.
